BIOGRAPHY

Jofre Oliveras (b. 1989, Girona, Spain) is a transnational artist and researcher working at the intersection of art, ecology and technology.

His practice is polymathic and experimental, moving fluidly between disciplines — from murals and public-space interventions to biomimetic energy, electronic sculpture and land-art architecture. With a background in philosophy and journalism, he uses language and material as tools to question dominant narratives of progress, productivity and ownership.

Rooted in Mediterranean culture, his work draws on classical references and techniques, in constant dialogue with the landscape that shaped him.

Working primarily in public space and across countries, he develops site-responsive projects that engage directly with landscape, community and cultural context. Once made, the work remains, ages and transforms — which is why he understands his practice as that of a landscaper.

AMMAN, JORDAN MURAL PAINTING

25 X 10 M

An aerial, slightly high-angle view of a city street. On the left is a multi-story stone building with many windows. In the center, a tall, narrow white rectangular structure, possibly a bus stop or a small building, features a large mural of a person in a white cloak standing on a dark, rocky outcrop. To the right of this structure is a multi-story parking garage with a metal frame. Further right is a row of older, lower buildings. In the background, a large cathedral with multiple spires is visible against a grey, overcast sky. The overall tone is somber and historical.

DISARRAY

INTEGRAL PART OF OUR LIVED EXPERIENCE

In 'The Fall,' ancient Greek and Roman busts and sculptures are depicted in a state of collapse, symbolizing the fragility of human achievement and the impermanence of cultural artifacts. This artwork reflects a contemporary vision where piles of sculptures and past representations are not viewed as mere relics of history, but as contemporary ruins—remnants of narratives and histories that have fallen into. The chaotic arrangement of the sculptures serves as a metaphor for the complexities of our present world, where the remnants of the past are interwoven with the

NEW FRONTIERS WHILE NEGLECTING
OUR OWN

In a world where nationalism clouds our vision, borders grow ever more fortified, hindering cultural exchange and erasing perceptions beyond regional confines. Isolation deepens, making it harder to acknowledge the critical global challenges we face—be it resource depletion, the migration crisis, or climate change. The narrative of space colonization mirrors the mindset of past colonizers. As we contemplate our future beyond this planet, we must confront the irony of seeking

WORLD

OIL ON ALUMINIUM 165 X 76 X 8 MM

Digital Ruins is a reinterpretation of the classical landscape paintings. A series of oil paintings on aluminium or wood in the shape and scale of a smartphone. The reflection behind this artworks is related to the digital era, and how our observation of ruins can present a virtual dimension. The smartphone format nods to our own relationship with the virtual world, the constant interaction and virtualization of our private lives. The landscape format, besides being a reinterpretation of classical pictorial landscapes, is referring to monuments and ruins of the past. This connects two visions of ruins, physical and virtual. The prevalence of hyper-documentation and daily updates in virtual reality has created a vast and overlapping archive of data, much of which is constantly

A large, bright yellow inflatable tank is the central focus of the image, positioned on a basketball court. The tank has a long, thick barrel extending towards the upper right. Two children are interacting with the tank: one is climbing on its side, and another is running away from it towards a basketball hoop on the left. The background features a cloudy sky, trees, and a distant body of water.
